SPEAKER:

Dr. Raj Kumar Singh, Assistant Professor, Department of Botany, GGDC, Mangalkote

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SEMINAR:

The seminar began with the speaker describing agroforestry as a concept of farming where trees are combined with crops or even with animal husbandry to provide a sustainable livelihood to farmers. He described how trees take a long time to develop, produce fruits or become suitable for obtaining timber. Cropping vegetables can be beneficial, when planted in-between the trees, as they don't take much time before they become worthy of harvesting thereby providing an income source as the trees take time to grow. He also stressed on how the levels of soil their roots penetrated and derived nutrition from varied in case of trees and crops making the same piece of land more productive. He gave examples where the trees in agroforestry can house several agents for bio-control of crop pests reducing the dependence on pesticides. It also helps in enhancing biodiversity. Then he gave examples of how trees when coupled with animal grazing can also be fruitful when their dungs enhance the soil fertility and tree roots enrich the carbon content of soil. Delving into the reasons for its lack of popularity, the speaker explained how farmers don't want to experiment with their lands or how much patience the process requires. Eventually, he concluded his lecture by elaborating how agroforestry can combat climate change and the rising concerns of deforestation while securing the income of farmers in case of failure of production due to unfavourable weather conditions.
