The concept of social inclusion and exclusion occupy a prime concern in recent public policy discourse. In general social exclusion is a multidimensional process by which an individual, a particular sector of the society, or an entire community is barred to access the core resources which are available to the other member of that society. On the other hand, social inclusion is the affirmative policies that are designed to include the formally excluded member of the society.

Globally every single nation-state of the modern time faces more or less the same problem concerning the proper inclusion of minorities into the mainstream. Like exclusion, inclusion is also a multidimensional process, and the policy and means of inclusion contrast from society to society. It is imperative to note that strategy for inclusion of a particular community can turn into an exclusionary route for another. Hence detecting the target group' intended for inclusion and the stratagem for inclusion is a colossal job for the policymaker

In recent times we have witnessed much carnage around the world to resolves multifaceted problems associated with the appropriate inclusion of minorities. India is not an exception to that. Being a principal minority community of India the presentation of Muslims in various social indicators is very pitiable. A number of committees
